Climate Change: Appeal to Sustainable Tourism

Ministers of Foreign Affairs of Cape Verde, Costa Rica, Slovenia, Singapore and United Arab Emirates have written and published the following article on Climate Change and Tourism. The ministers are members of Green Group, which is an informal group whose objective is to raise awareness that environmental and environment-related topics should be on foreign policy agendas. Cooperation focuses on climate change, renewables, sustainable development and sustainable water management.

Six countries* from different regions of the globe have been united in a joint effort to fight global challenges such as climate change, water and sustainable development. These challenges are interdependent, for there cannot be water without a sound climate, development without water or prosperity without harmony between man and nature. Each and every one of us can contribute in our own way to healthier living and the political, security, social and economic environment. With each passing year, climate change effects are becoming more apparent, and water constraints are making themselves felt more keenly. However, we have many opportunities to begin working towards more sustainable development.

The most recent IPCC report on the effects of climate change (2013) shows it is being felt around the world. We need to both cut emissions and ensure that our infrastructure and ecosystems are prepared for a warmer world.

Few sectors encompass the range of challenges posed by climate change and water issues as fully as tourism. Tourists emit greenhouse gases as they fly across the globe. They stay in luxurious, water-intensive hotels. They consume food and other goods shipped in from around the world. Depending on what is included, tourism accounts for an estimated 4 to 10% of global emissions. Tourists demand infrastructure in locations, such as coastal resorts, that are particularly vulnerable to future climate change.

At the same time, tourists drive much positive change. The very fact that they value coastal areas, clean seas and beautiful scenery is what makes possible the protection of these resources in many places. Tourism generates 10% of global GDP; it is one of the fastest growing sectors and has a great multiplier effect. It provides valuable income to regions or even entire countries which might otherwise remain in poverty or see their young people migrate to cities. In some cases, tourism is a lever to protect a valuable habitat – a rainforest, a coral reef, a mangrove swamp – even in the face of other commercial pressures.

A less tangible, but perhaps even more important fact, is that tourism brings much of the world's populations into contact with new cultures, new peoples and new environments.

These experiences teach us to value not only our own countries and communities, but also those around the world. These shared values are essential to confronting challenges such as climate change.

It is essential to reduce negative impacts while making the most of the benefits. Our countries have taken leading roles in this endeavour. For instance, airlines from Singapore and the UAE are currently some of the most efficient in the world, with emissions per passenger kilometre being around 25% lower than the global average. Hotels can adopt cutting edge energy and water efficiency measures. Tourism can also be made more sustainable by means of broader measures, such as the increased use of renewable energy in all countries. The UAE has made a Green Growth Strategy, including tourism, the core of its development strategy.

Some countries, such as Costa Rica, have made "eco-tourism" their main strategy for attracting tourists. Obviously, the extent to which a country can do this depends on the habitats at its disposal and other pressures on the land. It also shows how tourism can effectively protect vital ecosystems in the long term. Even if tourism is not entirely focused on nature, important protection mechanisms are possible, e. g. the UAE's policy to preserve and expand mangrove forests despite coastal development. Slovenia is a very green country, rich in water and biodiversity. Its tourism is based on nature, the mountains, lakes, hot springs, and the sea. To preserve its landscape and the quality of life, a Tourism Development Strategy was adopted with a view to promoting sustainable tourism. The identity of destinations is being strengthened as active, healthy, and green.

Cape Verde is a vulnerable country, mainly due to its isolation, water shortage and fragile ecosystems. To date, tourism development has focused on coastal zones (sun, sand and sea tourism), which has already produced some negative environmental impacts. The Government has shown concern and is taking measures to tackle the barriers to tourism becoming a tool for sustainable development. In pursuing this goal, focus has been placed on investment in renewable energy, a holistic environmental management approach, and collaborative partnerships, such as the Public-Private Partnership for Sustainable Tourism developed in 2010.

The international community has also recognised the importance of making tourism more sustainable in many venues . The World Tourism Organisation not only stresses the three pillars of sustainable development – economic, social, and environmental – but also accords a specific section to the unique challenge of climate change.

Certain progress has been made in fighting climate change as part of the UNFCCC negotiations, but we still have far to go. The World Economic Forum in Davos in January 2014 will again look at climate change and the economic dimensions of addressing it. In September 2014, UN Secretary-General Ban Ki-moon will invite world leaders to participate in the Climate Summit. Their shared goal will be to mobilise action and ambition regarding climate change to keep the rise in average global temperatures at 2 degrees Celsius above pre-industrial levels. This will provide another opportunity for us to reconcile the need for economic development and climate protection. Tourism is showing us both the challenges and opportunities of this effort.

Although we may have different ideas, economies, policies, and philosophies, we live with the environment and will continue to depend on it.

Signed:

H.E. Jorge Alberto da Silva Borges, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Cape Verde

Trebnje

In the dynamic area of the southeastern Slovenia in the region of Lower Carniola lies the town of Trebnje. The Celtic Latobici tribe lived here already in prehistoric times. In the Roman period, this was a famous staging post along the road Emona – Siscia, and the Roman emperor Vespasian named the settlement Municipium Praetorium. However, the name of Trebnje was most likely derived from the verb "trebiti", which in Slovene means clearing a forest, or from the German word "treffen" (to encounter). The linear, urbanized settlement, which climbs the terraces and hills on the left bank of the disappearing karst river Temenica, is a nowadays also a center of Trebnje municipality. A railroad has connected Trebnje with Novo Mesto and Ljubljana ever since 1894 and with the town of Sevnica since 1938.

The Trebnje Castle, which was first mentioned in written sources in 1386 and can be traced back to the year 1000, is located on the right bank of the river Temenica, on a hill below the Ljubjana-Zagreb highway. The original owners of the castle were the Lords of Trebnje from Carinthia, but it was later owned by the Ortenburgs, the Counts of Celje, the Hapsburgs, and others. The castle has retained many ancient sections – a square tower with Roman foundations, a round tower from the time of the Ottoman Wars – and was expanded to its present form in the 16th century. A stone lion from Roman times reigns at top of the castle stairs. The lion is also depicted in the coat of arms of the municipality.

The castle was owned from 1812 to 1824 by bishop Frederic Irenaeus Baraga, who was born in the nearby village of Mala vas. Baraga was later a missionary to the Indians in the United States and Canada, and a scholar of Native American languages. While staying in La Pointe, Wisconsin, Baraga wrote the book History, Character, Customs and Habits of North American Indians, through which Europeans first learned about the Indian princess Pocahontas.

The town is also very proud of The Gallery of Naïve Artists, which was a result of the activity of annual International Meetings of Naïve Artists (first organized in 1968, and still held every year in June). The Gallery is known as the only public collection of naïve art in Slovenia and as one of the more important collections of its kind in the world.

Missionary Baraga was a scholar of Native American languages.

The Jurij homestead is compact and consists of a single-storey farmhouse, an outhouse, a wooden granary, a barn, a well, a trellis and an orchard.

Near the Gallery stands the parish church of the Assumption of Our Lady. The Late Gothic church with three naves and six octagonal pillars from 1443 stands on the site of an older church. It boasts a late Baroque presbytery with a fresco of the Assumption, painted by the Slovenian painter Matevž Langus, and built into its wall is a Roman relief of three busts. In 2012, a monument to the honorary citizen of Trebnje, the Archbishop and Metropolitan of Ljubjana, Dr Alojzij Šuštar, was unveiled on the south side of the church.

Every man or woman of importance that came from or left his mark on the municipality is included in The Growing Book of the Temenica and Mirna Valleys, the first permanent exhibition of its kind in Slovenia, which is housed in the lobby of the Center for Education and Culture (CIK) in Trebnje.

At the settlement of Medvedjek, east of Trebnje, which was the site of a battle in the Slovenian War of Independence in 1991, a memorial park was built on the 20th anniversary of the conflict in memory and reminder of the events that took place in the area.

The Jurij homestead, a monument of local importance, is located in the nearby village of Občine, at the edge of the region of Suha Krajina. Due to cultural, ethnological, regional, historical and other noteworthy characteristics, it has a special meaning for providing information about the life of country folk at the time before, during and right after World War II.

The cultural house in the village of Dobrič houses the Memorial room of the 1st congress of the Slovenian antifascist women's association, which in 2013 celebrated its 70th anniversary. In the vicinity, stands the church of Sv. Jurij (St. George) built in the Baroque style in 1777.

Next to its cultural and historic features, the town of Trebnje and its surroundings invite visitors to engage in sports activities such as biking, hunting and fishing. The south side of the town is covered by the wooded slope of Bukovje, a popular walking and hiking destination. On the top of the hill VrhTrebnje, there stands a marker of 15th eastern meridian -- a stone plaque with a sundial and a bronze relief of Slovenia. It is a lookout point with a lovely view of the wavy, vineyard-covered landscape of Dolenjska (Lower Carniola), and, in clear weather, the eye can see all the way to the nation's highest mountain -- Mt. Triglav. More information is available at: tic@trebnje.si.

Slovenian Women's Union Scholarship Foundation - 1949 to 2014

Sixty five years ago, the Slovenian Women's Union Scholarship Fund began its charitable work for the Slovenian Women's' Union of America. Funding then began, and scholarships were first awarded annually beginning in 1949. Since that time, over 400 scholarships have been awarded to college students, resulting in many graduates'
