The Only Alternative to Water Is Water: Blue Peace for the 21st Century

By Danilo Türk, former President of Slovenia and Chairman of the Global High Level Panel on Water and Peace, convened by 15 countries from all parts of the world. The article was published in the Huffington Post on March 22 on the occasion of the World Water Day.

Until a year ago, serious tensions were mounting in northeastern Africa. Egypt, Sudan and Ethiopia confronted each other over the Grand Ethiopian Renaissance Dam on the border between Ethiopia and Sudan. Ethiopia had started building the dam, claiming its rights to use waters of the Nile River within its territory. Egypt, “the gift of the Nile”, objected, fearing that the dam would obstruct the flow of the river to its fields.

Former President of Slovenia, Dr. Danilo Türk, actively participated at the Global Water Security Summit, which took place March 22 at the United States Institute of Peace.

Suddenly, a miracle happened: seizing the occasion of the World Water Day on March 22, 2015, the presidents of the three countries met in Khartoum and decided to coordinate the construction of the dam in a way that would cause no harm and would allow an equitable outcome. Implementing their agreement is not easy. But the hostile rhetoric has toned down and a spirit of cooperation is gradually surfacing in the region.

There is no alternative to trans-boundary water cooperation anywhere in the world. There are 263 shared river basins, extending through 148 countries. Unless the countries through which the rivers run collaborate for the sustainable management of water courses, wars and environmental disasters can occur. On the other hand, cooperation in water usage can lead to comprehensive peace.

The Water Cooperation Quotient, constructed on the basis of the analysis of 219 shared river basins by Strategic Foresight Group, an international think-tank, reaches a dramatic conclusion. Any two countries engaged in active water cooperation are not likely to go to war over water or for any other reason.

It is often asked whether water would be the oil of the twenty-first century. It certainly is not. Oil has alternatives such as natural gas and renewable energy. The only alternative to water is water. Therefore, last September the United Nations General Assembly adopted the Water Goal as one of the Sustainable Development Goals. It has an ambitious objective of ensuring water security of the world's population by 2030. Cooperation among countries is an important component of the U.N. Water Goal.

The Water Cooperation Quotient provides a scientific formula to measure trans-boundary cooperation using indicators of joint investments, collaborative management of environment, cooperative management of floods and drought, integration of water in regional economic programs, and interaction among the heads of states to enable large exchanges.

When countries reach the optimum level of water cooperation, they are in the state of Blue Peace. At this stage, water transforms from a source of potential crisis into an instrument of peace. The Senegal River Basin Organization, established by Guinea, Mali, Mauritania and Senegal in West Africa, is an example of Blue Peace. The four countries jointly own all water-related infrastructure, including dams and hydro-electric stations. The organization also facilitates political dialogue to end ethnic or border conflicts.

The Middle East is conspicuous for its absence of joint river-management bodies. This is one of the reasons why ISIS, the violent extremist group, has been able to spread so quickly. They take over vital dams and use them to incarcerate high-value prisoners, knowing well that such dams cannot be bombed for fear of flooding the entire region. They also use their control over dams and pipelines to force people to obey their order. For years, Iraq, Syria and Turkey refused to heed calls for cooperation over the Euphrates and Tigris Rivers. The result is that all the three states have lost, and a non-state organization has space to create a base for its violent designs against the civilized world.

In order to usher in an era of Blue Peace in this century, it is necessary for the international community to join hands to achieve concrete results. First, it is essential to encourage all 263 shared river basins to establish collaborative institutions and joint investment plans, slowly climbing up on the Water Cooperation Quotient.

Second, it is necessary to introduce concessional and preferential financial possibilities for the neighboring countries who wish to cooperate in the management of water basins.

Third, water infrastructure must be protected from terrorist actions and violent conflicts.

Finally, the members of the U.N. Security Council need to come together for the future of the world's water. It is in their interest to prevent ISIS from controlling dams and reservoirs. It is in their interest to boost economic growth in all shared river basins of the developing world. It is, indeed, essential to establish Blue Peace in every region, and the World Water Day of 2016 is a good occasion to strengthen every effort in this direction.

On April 4 – Lend Your Leg

“Lend Your Leg” is a campaign that encourages people worldwide by a symbolic gesture of rolling up a pant leg to stop the damage landmines still cause while showing solidarity with all survivors of landmines and other explosive remnants of war.”

ITF launched its campaign marking the International Day of Mine Awareness and Assistance in Mine Action. On this occasion, various events will take place in Ljubljana between April 4 and 8.

Mines and explosive remnants of war (ERW) continue to pose an imminent threat to human security in highly impacted countries, like Bosnia and Herzegovina, Croatia, Afghanistan, Colombia, Cambodia, Turkey or Iraq. In spite of continuous efforts of the international community in this field, mines/ERW still claim around 3,000 victims annually. In times of numerous conflicts and great humanitarian needs, mine action is a much needed means of providing the safety and security of individuals, communities and broader societies, while also ensuring the delivery of urgent humanitarian assistance and advancing long-term development cooperation.

Since its establishment in March 1998 by the Slovenian Government, ITF Enhancing Human Security (ITF) has been a proud member of the international community working on mitigating and eliminating mine-related threats. In 18 years, and most importantly with the kind support of ITF’s public and private donors, over $400 million have been raised to clear over 135 million sq.m. of mine/ERW contaminated land, to help rehabilitate 1,251 mine victims, and carry out numerous other activities in the field of enhancing human security. Yet, the work is far from done.

With this in mind, ITF has since 2012 also been engaged in activities marking the International Day of Mine Awareness and Assistance in Mine Action on April 4. The scope of this year’s campaign is twofold: ITF aims to raise awareness among Slovenians on the current disruptive challenges posed by landmines/ERW around the world, and especially in our neighborhood (the Western Balkans). At the same time, the ITF wishes to highlight the role of the Republic of Slovenia and ITF in joint efforts to reduce the danger of mines and ERW. To this end, various events are scheduled between April 4 and 8; more information is available at: <http://www.itf-fund.si/> and <https://www.facebook.com/FundITF>

What better way to learn about Slovenia's history, art and heritage than by visiting various museums spread throughout the country? When making a list of things to do in Slovenia, do not forget about interesting galleries and museum collections. We will do our best to introduce as many as possible in our newsletter.

Second World War was one of the most difficult trials for mankind. Like other freedom-loving nations, the Slovenes organized themselves to fight against fascism and nazism. Particular institutions of the Slovenian resistance movement were clandestine hospitals. They were built in barely accessible forests, deep gorges and underground caves. After the capitulation of Italy in autumn of 1943, Dr. Viktor Volčjak and a group of fighters began to build a new hospital in the barely accessible Pasice gorge in Dolenji Novaki in the Cerklno region on the advice of a local inhabitant, Janez Peternej. With the dedicated assistance of the locals, the hospital was being constructed in phases through the end of war, when 14 wooden cabins and several auxiliary facilities were squeezed into the bottom of the gorge of the Čerinščica creek.

Already during the war, the hospital was named after Franja Bojc Bidovec, a partisan physician, who was the longest-serving administrator of the hospital.

The access path to the hospital ran along the Čerinščica. Before being transported -- which took place at night -- the wounded were blindfolded to ensure they could not see and reveal where they were treated. This was the only clandestine partisan hospital that set up its own defense system. Although the enemy came twice into the immediate vicinity of the hospital, it was never discovered. The hospital facility in the gorge was intended primarily for severely injured patients, while others were treated in dislocated units that were not preserved after the war.

The medical staff saved lives in circumstances that are hardly imaginable today. While surgery was rarely performed without narcosis and the surgeons mostly had at their disposal ether, pentothal, and other drugs. There was, however, a lack of antibiotics, blood and plasma. The staff also had to improvise the disinfection of surgical linen and instruments. Sanitary materials and medicines were sent by field organizations, and aid also came through clandestine connections from as far away as Milan and Graz and the first consignment of sanitary materials from the Allies arrived in March 1944.

A colorful cultural life gradually developed at the hospital. Along with medical care, entertainment was also of crucial importance for the patients so that they did not become despondent. Commemorations and meetings, featuring political speeches, singing, recitations and sketches were frequently organized. A literary magazine entitled Bolniški list (Patient's Bulletin) was also published. 578 severely wounded persons were treated in the central facility, today known as the Franja Partisan Hospital, and about 300 wounded were treated in ten dislocated units. Among the wounded were, besides Slovenes, also members of former Yugoslav nations and the nations of the Soviet Union, Italians, Poles, Frenchmen, two Austrians and two Americans. One of them, Harold C. Adams, was an American Air Force pilot, whose plane was shot down in February 1944. He injured his leg while landing on the plateau Šentviška planota, and was brought to the hospital. The staff of the Franja Partisan Hospital enabled the American Air Force lieutenant to return safely to his homeland. He was one of more than 300 allied pilots rescued by Slovenian partisans.

Franja Hospital is a cultural monument of national importance, entered in UNESCO's Tentative List of World Heritage. Because of a flood, the hospital was almost entirely destroyed in 2007, but soon thereafter was completely reconstructed. Due to its symbolic value and its role in the European history and culture, Partisan hospital Franja received the European heritage label in 2015. Franja is a unique example of providing healthcare in adverse circumstances and is also a symbol of humanity, solidarity and comradeship among local people, hospital staff members and wounded soldiers, who fought against fascism nad nazism in World War II.

The ensemble was formed in 2002 and has since established a reputation for excellence and versatility and performed recitals, concerts, and master classes throughout Europe and the U.S.

By commissioning and premiering numerous works dedicated to the 4Saxess quartet, the ensemble has made a big contribution to the saxophone quartet repertoire. This genre leading quartet regularly collaborates with several composers with the aim of performing original music that has been created and arranged exclusively for them. These compositions have also become regular features of concert programs by similar ensembles, both in Slovenia and elsewhere in Europe. So far, the group has released two CDs "4 Folk" in 2007 and "4 US" in 2011, both produced by RTV Slovenia.

When one of them inherits a run-down empty dry cleaner, three friends decide to take over and start their own pizzeria. Of course, whenever in starting a new business, obstacles abound—in this case: opening a business in a run-down neighborhood, goons looking for a shakedown, and knowing absolutely nothing about starting a new business. ŠIŠKA DELUXE is a comedy about what it takes to go from being an extra-small cheese to a deep-dish sheet pizza with all the toppings. Mile, Fedr, and Zekir are three slackers looking for their slice of the pie. But when business is slow, you need a great idea. The pizza special of the title is your order of pizza with anything else you want. Need a swan for a photo shoot? Order a pizza and you get your swan. Need a case of beer? Done. Drugs? Done.
